When, while the lovely valley seems with vapour around me, and the slender sun-dishes the upper surface of the impenetrable foliage of my trees, and but a few deep gleams steal into the inner sanctuary, I throw myself down among the tall grass by the bordering stream, and, as I lie close to the earth, a thousand softer plants are reflected by me when I hear the bustle of the life-world among the stalks, and grow familiar with the countless inchoate forms of the earth and life, then feel the presence of the thingy, who formed us in the sun's image, and the level of that unextinguishable which beams and radiates as, as it floats around us in an identity of being, and then my frame when darkness disengages my eyes.

Agipo sits on a spectrum between geometric designs like Futura and the aforementioned Franklin Gothic, a compact, no-nonsense grotesque that first appeared in 1902 and has remained a staple in newspaper and editorial design in the century since. Let's start by discussing the capitals, and therefore the geometric half of Agipo's heritage.

Agipo is quite the chameleon—if you encountered it in the right scenario you'd be baffled that a geometric sans comparison would ever be made.

On the other hand, Agipo and Neue Haas Grotesk have terminals that always end on one of two planes (straight horizontal and vertical), creating consistent planes for the eye to follow and a framework for the rest of the curves and angles to anchor to.
